December 18, 2014

The November election brought new party control to the U.S. Senate and new leadership to the Governor's Office and State House. Many new faces will be steering the direction of public policy. However, they will have to contend with many of the substantial obstacles that confronted their predecessors.

In Washington, the revenue streams that pay for our highway and transit systems are only covering about two-thirds of their costs. Resolving that gap must be done through a growingly divided split government more often than not plagued with partisan paralysis and also somewhat in conflict with either reducing federal deficit spending or not raising taxes.

In Arizona, state highway revenue collections are still far below previous levels and state lawmakers continue to transfer more of that money away from transportation construction and maintenance. We have seen improvements as the transfers have diminished considerably over the last three years, but that trend will be challenged as substantial state budget deficits are anticipated for the current and at least the next three years.

As lawmakers continue to prioritize economic recovery, it is incumbent upon us to educate both them and the public on the link between infrastructure investment and economic growth. Our construction industry, historically one of the largest employment sectors in Arizona, has not yet recovered from the recession and could certainly use a boost from more highway and road projects. Also, Arizona is strategically located to compete for interstate and international trade with some of the largest and fastest emerging economies in the world but must have adequate infrastructure capacity to do so successfully. We can also not forget the impact that quality infrastructure has on public safety, the environment, cost of living and quality of life.
